Small pieces of paper can get caught inside the printer mechanism if you had to rip the paper out of the machine. Have a really good look inside to see what is still stuck. It may not be paper that is causing the jam. It is quite easy to put an object on top of the printer only for it to fall in to the printer accidentally. Remove both cartridges and then insert them again. Change each cartridge in sequence until the error clears, this should help you identify which cartridge is causing the problem. It could be that one or both of the cartridges are not inserted into the printer correctly. One or both of the cartridges may have failed electrically, and need to be replaced. The encoder film strip in the clear strip of plastic that the printer carriage runs on. Be extremely careful when touching this, as it is very delicate. You may be able to fix it yourself if you are willing to take the machine apart and spend some time with it. Every time the printer runs a head cleaning routine, it flushes some ink through the print heads to keep them clean and clear. That ink runs in to the waste ink absorber. It is normally a large sponge or tank. This means that the printer is at the end of its life. Be careful when moving and disposing of the printer though. The ink absorber is full and so there is a small chance of the printer leaking when it is moved. To be on the safe side, put it in a large bag first. This can be checked by installing some old cartridges to see if the error clears. The copper contacts on the outside of the cartridge contain the ink level information. It is not possible to reset the ink levels to full. If you refill your cartridge, the printer will always show an empty cartridge message. The printer should continue printing, and use any of the remaining ink in the cartridge. By pressing the maintenance button looks like a spanner and a screwdriver repeatedly, you can cycle through the following codes.<http://godilanka.com/userfiles/integra-manual-transmission.xml>
